

Rewrite Your Marketing on the Customer's Terms (Kill Ego Marketing)

Make every page lead with the customer's pain and the problem you solve — not your features or your AI — so your content actually converts. Distilled from Benjamin Behrooz (Branding Los Angeles) on Unscripted SEO.

Objective

Audit and rewrite your site and marketing so a stranger instantly sees their problem and how you solve it. As Benjamin puts it, the biggest mistake is “building it for yourself and not your customer” — perception is the whole game.

Key Steps

1. Lead with their pain, not your feature list. Open every page with the worry the customer actually has — “what are they worried about?” — before you say a word about yourself.
2. Run an ego-marketing audit. Read your homepage + service pages and count “we / us / our” vs “you / your.” If the page is about you, rewrite it around the customer's problem.
3. Name the problem you solve in one sentence. “We help [customer] solve [problem] so they can [outcome].” If you can't fill it in, you have a positioning problem, not a marketing one.
4. Use the customer's own words. Pull verbatim pain language from reviews, sales calls, and support tickets — it's how they search and how they'll recognize themselves.
5. Sell the outcome, not the tech. “They don't give a damn that you have AI — they want their calendar to work.” Translate every feature into a customer outcome before it goes on the page.
6. Build the “front office of visibility.” A great back office (real work, good reviews) with no bullhorn is invisible — get on the channels where your buyers actually look.
7. For local / blue-collar, layer IRL + geo touchpoints. Branded street team, print on the door, then geo-targeted digital follow-up — the human touch AI can't copy.

Cautionary Notes

- Ego marketing is the default failure mode — if the page is about you, it won't convert.
- Feature-first / AI-first copy repels buyers who only care about their outcome.
- A great back office with no front office = invisible; don't skip visibility.
- Don't invent customer language — use their real words or you'll miss how they search.

Tips for Efficiency

- Mine reviews, sales calls, and support tickets for verbatim customer-pain language.
- Use the one-sentence test as a gate before any page ships.
- Global find-and-replace pass: swap “we/us” → “you/your” and re-read.
- Keep a feature→outcome translation table so no raw feature reaches a page.

Source: Benjamin Behrooz, Branding Los Angeles — on Unscripted SEO he argued you must “go into the market on your customers' terms” and that the biggest mistake is building it for yourself, not the customer.